Informed Consent Form

FORM 2 OF 3

This form describes in detail how the study works and your role in it. Your signature means you understand and agree to participate.

BEFORE YOU SIGN, YOU SHOULD KNOW

- 1 This study aims to advance understanding of how activity and your habits can contribute to a healthier heart.
- 2 As a participant, you'll be asked to complete occasional, short surveys and record your workouts on your Apple Watch.
- 3 The study will last at least 5 years. You'll be asked to renew your consent every 2 years.
- 4 Participation is voluntary. You can leave the study at any time and stop sharing your data at any time.
- 5 The study will do its best to ensure your data is kept confidential and secure. As with all studies, complete confidentiality cannot be guaranteed.

The circumstances have changed and I now find myself in a position where I'd like to reenter the workforce." "I decided to take five years off to start a family." "I accepted a position with another company that was closer to home." 9. They could yell and scream or say something derogatory about you... Don't sweat it. If not, you may be able to receive on-the-job training or obtain your certifications as you work.Become Familiar With the RequirementsEach personal assistant job will have different requirements. One of your best assets will be your ability to remain flexible. Working as a personal assistant is an excellent way of building the experience necessary to move into your profession. Did you leave your job because you felt underutilized or unappreciated? 1. More on that a little down the line...but for now, keep that in mind. If you left on your own, again, the employer wants to make sure it's for the right reasons. "I left my last job in order to take care of a family issue. There may be potential for earning a higher salary in some fields, such as a physical therapy assistant or a medical assistant. If you remain calm and professional, 99 times out of 100 your boss will totally understand. Your reasons for leaving a job can say volumes about who you are both professionally and ethically and help an employer determine if you're a good fit (or not) for the new position. Your Old Boss Is No Longer With The Company And You Don't "Vibe" With Your New Boss This scenario is not unusual. DON'T LIE! But at the same time, there are ways to answer this question without either tanking yourself or talking smack about your last employer (neither of which is a good idea) WHATEVER YOU DO, DO NOT BADMOUTH YOUR FORMER EMPLOYER. Probably not. You've Been Laid Off Hey, It's okay. Huh? When faced with this question in an interview, you can add a bit to that simple answer. Some of the best, most influential people in the world have been fired. 4. Was that a result of your overblown sense of importance or because you had truly achieved as much with a company as you could possibly achieve. No employer wants to hear how awful your last job was (even if it was literally the worst job in the history of all jobs. I don't care if you were kept in the worst conditions ever where you were underpaid, forced to endure humiliating situations, and had a clown come into the room every three hours and kick you in the gut...DO NOT BADMOUTH YOUR FORMER EMPLOYER. Some bosses are jerks (those of you that have a jerk boss know what I am talking about), and their reception isn't always going to be "hugs and kisses" like some of the nice bosses out there. If you have interest in becoming a medical assistant in the front office, for example, you may need medical certification or training. You've Been Fired Okay, let's address the elephant in the room. Have you already left and are actively in the market looking for a new position? You Didn't Like What You Were Doing Maybe the job wasn't one you enjoyed doing, or the job changed from what you originally anticipated it to be. At this time I'm looking for employment with a company that allows me to use my professional experiences and skill sets in a long term, mutually beneficial professional relationship." 8. Thank them for the opportunity and what they have taught you during your time with the company. In fact, the majority of the time they will have seen it coming already. When reading job descriptions, be sure that your skills and qualifications are up to par. Save those stories for your tell all biography...or better yet, movie of the week...). If you were fired for performance issues, make sure you mention extenuating circumstances, but don't put all the blame on other people. What this means is that if you haven't yet found the job you're looking for, you have to find the courage to approach individuals you want to work for. Although changes like this might leave large gaps in your work history (especially in the case of going back to school) those gaps are not a reason for an employer to be concerned...especially if the ultimate goal was a desire for self-improvement! "I went back to school to pursue a master's degree program." (especially strong answer if what you've gotten your degree in relates to the job you are applying for!) 4. So, when you're interviewing for this job, make sure it is apparent how flexible you are. You did it! It's Your Turn So there you have it... all three potential scenarios covered for dealing with the reasons to leave your last job, and more than enough examples and sample answers to get you started! Just keep in mind as you go through the interview process that a potential employer is going to be curious about all your past jobs, especially as they relate to your ability to work well within their company. Worst case scenario: Your boss is the star witness in your upcoming criminal case. After all, do you really want to stick around in a position where you have to put up with that kind of behavior? BONUS PDF CHEAT SHEET: Download our "Why Did You Leave Your Last Job PDF Cheat Sheet" that gives you: 5 word-word-for-word answers to this tough interview question including the following scenarios: You didn't enjoy the work You needed a change You needed more money You were fired And more! PLUS: 20 more great reasons you can use to enter into your job application that aren't found in this article. When you left, did you do it in such a way that you are still on good terms with your former employer or are you off on a "persona non grata"? Were you escorted out of the office by security? Although at the time I was devastated, I realize now this was an opportunity to move my career in a new direction and continue my professional education." One final note about your job interview. Yes, you got fired. Then head over to our article "How To Write a Resignation Letter" to get our tips for making this difficult situation much easier! Anyway, when faced with having to answer the question, "Why did you leave your last job?" it's understandable to have a moment (or two) of trepidation and uncertainty. YOU ARE NOT LEGALLY REQUIRED TO INFORM A POTENTIAL EMPLOYER IF YOU WERE FIRED OR TERMINATED FROM A FORMER JOB. Rather than letting future employers know about that frustration, turn it into a positive! "I realized that the opportunity to grow wasn't available to me and that in order to continue to improve myself professionally, it was time to move on." "I achieved everything professionally that was available at my last employer and feel that in order to keep improving myself both personally and professionally, that it was time to move onto a new company with more room for growth." "I'm interested in a job where I can be given more responsibility and will challenge me." 6. Now there are certainly exceptions to this rule. Once you learn how to properly describe your reasons for leaving for one of the scenarios listed above, you can apply the same logic to the other two. In this case, a simple "Completion of Freelance Assignment" is perfectly acceptable on a job application. Close the door and sit down. The world is a surprisingly small place, and you never know who knows who... On top of that, any future employer is going to wonder what you're going to say about them down the road or the next time you're looking for a job. If you were asked to leave, was it because of performance or integrity issues, or if it was due to other circumstances like downsizing, mergers, or a whole host of other, non-performance related issues. PLUS 15 reasons you SHOULD NOT use! CLICK HERE TO GET THE "WHY DID YOU LEAVE YOUR LAST JOB" CHEAT SHEET Let's Get the Heck Out Of Dodge! Jobs end for a whole multitude of reasons. If you're a freelancer, it could be you've completed the task you were hired for and it's time to move on. I will say it again...DO NOT BADMOUTH YOUR FORMER EMPLOYER. Are you in a job that you plan on leaving? There are jobs where you leave because you want to... and then there are times when you leave because you have to. Be sure you research the job position you're seeking thoroughly to ensure it fits with your needs and expectations.Understand the ChallengesThere are a wide variety of responsibilities that come with becoming a personal assistant. Another Company Offered You A Better Deal Leaving a former employer to take on work with a new employer should never affect your application status. Also be sure to detail your ability to communicate, multi-task and think strategically when carrying out day-to-day tasks.Be a Self-StarterBecause there's no such thing as career fairs for personal assistants, those who want to find these jobs must be self-starters. There are three main scenarios where this can happen: You are in a job interview and have been asked the question "Why did you leave your last job?" You are applying for a new job and one of the requirements on the job application is to give the reasons you left your last job. Express Appreciation This one speaks for itself. Look them in the eye confidently and... Let them have it! Trust me, it always seems like it is going to be a lot worse than it is. The last thing you want to do is give any possible employer any reason at all to question hiring you. MORE FROM QUESTIONSANSWERED.NET In life they say all good things (and bad things) must come to an end...and in the job market, that can ring especially true. You'll be working to ensure that your employer's needs are met as they come up. Unfortunately, sending an email or a text message isn't going to cut it, as you run the risk of being viewed as "spineless" or even worse, unprofessional. 3. Prime examples of this include quitting a job to go back to school, travel, work on outside interests or hobbies, or even try self-employment for a time. If you're a full time salaried employee, it can be a bit more difficult. We give you our formula for answering any job interview question perfectly, including "Why did you leave your last job?": For example, if you have interest in becoming an office assistant admin clerk for a company or professional you admire and they don't have a job listing, it's up to you to approach them with a winning proposal.Research SalariesAs of the time of writing the Bureau of Labor and Statistics states that the average earnings nationwide for a personal assistant is $18.21 hourly. P.S. To ensure a graceful exit from your job check out blog post "How to quit your job." 1) During An Interview: Why Did You Leave Your Last Job? If you left one job to take a position with another company for an increase in pay, a promotion, or simply because you wanted to work for a different company, those are all very valid reasons. So think of it like a band-aid... rip it off all at once! Walk into his or her office and ask for a moment of their time. Here's an example. Keep your answers neutral and clear of any negativity or defensiveness. Although I no longer work with the company, my former manager is one of my strongest references and would be happy to answer any questions you might have about my performance and skills." 10. Well...this question is no different! The more you think about it before you get to the interview (or even before you fill out the application) the better off you'll be answering it! And remember, like any question you'll be answering, the key to success (beyond preparation beforehand) is to keep your answers clear, concise and positive! This isn't the time to get defensive, or worse, talk trash. Maybe you just woke up one day and said, "Being an accountant isn't really what I want to do with the rest of my life, I think it's time to finally try being what I was always destined to be, a free range squirrel wrangler." More power to you! In this case, you want to make sure to avoid words like "quit" or "walked out." Instead try the following: "I reevaluated my career goals and am looking for other employment opportunities." "I am interested in pursuing other possibilities within my chosen career field." "I am currently looking for a position better matched to my skills and long-term career goals." "I am looking for a position within a company where I can contribute and grow." 3. Now while this isn't very common, you should still be prepared for it just in case it is a requirement. Answering this question can be a tricky balance between telling the truth while still managing to paint yourself in the best light possible. Always be honest, always be positive, and always keep your answer short. Unless you've never worked a day in your life ever, eventually everybody with a job will find themselves having to answer the question, "Why did you leave your last job?" or having to give your current employer reasons for leaving a job. You Have Other Life Goals You Want To Accomplish It is perfectly acceptable to leave a job because you realize that you have other goals you want to accomplish. Did you leave on your own or were you asked to leave? Therefore, you'll be looking at their schedule for the day, the week and the month, as well as the to-do lists they create each morning when you come to work. Are you a college student interested in getting a foot in the door with your chosen occupation? There is a good chance the hiring manager will want to dig into this question deeper during the interview, so don't feel like you have to write a 200-word response to the question on your application (especially if there is only space for a ten word response!). When answering this question, you don't need to list those reasons, simply keep it short and sweet: "I was offered a position with another company and accepted." "I was offered a promotion with another company and accepted." Short, sweet, and without too many details. Own up to your mistakes, but make sure to turn them into positives by showing how you've grown since then. You Are Overqualified and/or Under-Utilized We are all on the quest to find the perfect job that satisfies all our needs...but there are also times in our lives when you're forced to take a job because, well, you need the money! "Although it was a good job, I felt as though I had learned everything I could and wanted to move on to a new company where I can continue to grow professionally." "The job was a good fit for who I was when I initially accepted it, but as I have worked there, I have realized that where I want to go and where the company is going don't align." 7. Just be honest and let your potential employer know. Mike is a job interview and career expert and the head writer at TheInterviewGuys.com. Let's look at a few different reasons why you might have left your last job. There are no specific guidelines stating what a personal assistant will do for all jobs because they differ from one company or industry to the next. This is always a great way for a potential new employer to figure out that not only are you a good employee, but that you've got solid positive relationship skills, something which is always a highly sought after quality in the professional world. As we mentioned above, you need to make sure you know how to structure an interview question properly. It's important that you give them an honest response, but you don't want to be disrespectful. All that research? Remember all that prep we tell you to do? Being at the same job for years and never experiencing a promotion or feeling challenged can be incredibly frustrating. And as always... GOOD LUCK! — Here's what you're getting: 5 word-word-for-word answers to this tough interview question including the following scenarios: You didn't enjoy the work You needed a change You needed more money You were fired And more! 20 more great reasons you can use to enter into your job application that aren't found in this article. (Our "exit interview" and 2 weeks notice letter articles might help as well.) So when can you expect to have to deal with these scenarios, and what is the best way to deal with this tricky situation? You're usually hired for the duration of an assignment and then free to accept other work once that assignment is complete. Occasionally, certain companies will require that you give reasons for leaving your last job on your job application. Did you leave as a professional? "My position was eliminated and I was let go. Did you outgrow the role professionally because of your skills and abilities or did your ego outgrow the role? You've Been Working Toward A Promotion That Has Never Come Man, that sucks. But what happens if you get surprised with it before you even get an interview? 3) What to Tell Your Current Boss If

You Are Leaving This can be one of the most uncomfortable situations that you could face in your career. Neither is an easy situation...but it also doesn't have to be an impossible one... (And while we are talking about actually leaving a job... do you know how to write a proper resignation letter? You're a Part-Timer or Freelancer Looking For Full-Time Opportunities Being a freelancer is a little different. Although I was hired, it was clear as the job progressed that what was expected of me and what I was hired to do were two different things. Luckily, we're going to show you that this question isn't anywhere as scary as you think it is. "As a freelancer, I am contracted for only as long as it takes to finish the task I have been assigned. After all, you never know who your boss could know in other industries, and all it takes is one bad comment from this person to cause you problems in the future. They are bosses for a reason, meaning they have a pretty good idea of how their subordinates are feeling. In our case, we'll start with the job interview, and then you'll see that you'll already have the answer when it comes to the job application and the conversation you're going to need to have with your current boss. A good employer is going to recognize and understand that people leave jobs every day for many reasons. Before you go into an interview, look at your resume and make sure you can easily answer why you left your last job for every employer you have listed. Ultimately an employer wants to know are you loyal, stable, responsible and/or reasonable. This can also roll into your work values. Of course, we go back to our earlier comment about always keeping your answers positive. Best case scenario: your former boss is one of your references. PLUS 15 reasons you SHOULD NOT use! Click Here To Get The "Why Did You Leave Your Last Job" Cheat Sheet Co-Founder and CEO of TheInterviewGuys.com. I know that I've had several tough talks with different superiors for a variety of reasons, but at the end of the day, the one thing that was common was that it needed to be done. For example, it may be necessary to obtain certifications in business, or as a med tech. You don't need to tell the potential employer how much your raise was, or what the promotion was... 2. Here's the good part though. Learn more about The Interview Guys on our About Us page. The job is going to be different each day. His advice and insights have been shared and featured by publications such as Forbes, Entrepreneur, CNBC and more as well as educational institutions such as the University of Michigan, Penn State, Northeastern and others. Close It Out This is the time to go over any "housekeeping" such as what your last day will be (usually two weeks down the road), but also to answer any questions your boss might have. Are you a person who is solid and reliable or are you flighty and impulsive? You'll be required to meet personal and professional demands while working as a personal assistant. There are generally three things a hiring manager is trying to figure out about you when they ask this question: Did you leave for the right reasons? You are leaving your current job and need to give your current boss a reason for you leaving. What Should You Put On The Application? Now would be an excellent time to read "Job Interview Questions and Answers 101", the absolute best interview question resource available on the internet. As they say in Hollywood, "You're nobody until you've been fired at least once." Unfortunately, some employers see being fired as a red flag, regardless of what the reasons might be, so saying "I was fired" is not something you want to do in an interview or on an application. You've Had Personal Issues To Deal With Family always comes first and there are times when you have to step back from a job in order to take care of personal situations. When it became clear that they needed someone with more experience, I was let go. As the dynamics in any company changes, it can mean working with individuals who might not see eye to eye with you. This question is meant to honestly assess why you're back on the market, not trip you up...so instead of seeing it as a landmine, use it as yet another opportunity to demonstrate why YOU ARE THE PERFECT CANDIDATE! DISCLAIMER: Before we get too deep into this whole article, let me make one thing PERFECTLY CLEAR. This can be everything from personal health issues to taking care of other members of your family. 2) Reasons For Leaving a Job on an Application Ok, so now you know how to answer the question "Why Did You Leave Your Last Job" when faced with it during a job interview. But there are also certain things you NEED to know about the job interview itself. The most important thing to do is to quickly summarize your reasons for leaving your last job while keeping it positive, so that whoever is screening the applications doesn't have a reason for putting your application on the "no pile". "I am looking for a position with a company where I can be challenged and grow." "When my boss left, it made me realize that it was time for a change and this seemed like the perfect opportunity to move on as well." 5. While you may believe that being an assistant lab technician will consist of carrying out the same duties each day, this may not be the case. Give Reasons and Be Honest This is where you offer the message that we discussed above in the job interview example. After all, if you aren't able to tackle this portion of the application there is a good chance that you won't make it into the interview! Here's the good news though... You can use the examples we gave you above to help you give the best answer on your application... and thanks to space restrictions, you can give condensed version. Brace Yourself, This Question Is Coming The first thing you want to do is make sure you think about how you answer this before you even get to the interview. All that should do is reaffirm your reasons for leaving. Trust me, you're not alone. As long as you weren't laid off due to reasons related to performance or integrity, a potential employer isn't going to hold it against you...especially if you weren't the only one laid off from the company at the same time. 2. Did you leave because you were offered another position at another company or did you wake up one day and decide you were quitting to pursue your dreams of alpaca racing? No? Here are guidelines for how to get a job as a personal assistant.Complete Your Skills QualificationsEven though you're a college student, you may not have the necessary skill requirements for a personal assistant job. So keep these tips in mind when you walk into the office: 1. With mergers and restructuring, it's not unusual for a company to let go of a group of employees, regardless of performance or skills. All those practice questions and scenarios? When this is wrapped up, offer a firm handshake and say thank-you once again. Be Direct Don't waffle around, beat around the bush, or go into any long stories to try to delay the inevitable. Using "Reason #2" from above, you could simply put on your application: Left to pursue (and complete) Masters Degree. Get right to the point.
